"WE MEET TO PART."

An Episode which the Man Re Forgot.

rom Harper's Weakly.
One wild blustering night not many years ago a stage coach made a short de tour through one of the mountainou regions of Pennsylvania, and stopped a seemingly as remote from civilization as the heart of an Arabian desert. The Rev. far as vitality went, the st years of his tion, even the fretting discontent and

But Hagar shook the crimson turban on her fine Egyptain head, and declared it was not the parson's business o risk his lite with pestilential fevers. Even as she spoke, however, the parson and unloosed the chain and gone out in his scant gown and close cap to the coach his acast gown and close cap. to his coach, and lifted the poor woman out in his strong arms. Hagar followed him and his burden up the stairs, and, as the light from the candle fell upon taggled curls and braid, bits of ribbon, and a trip of embroidered lace that hung he head of the sick woman, a gold about her neck, and other personal a the head of the sick woman, a gold n about her neck, and other personal gaws that appealed to the contempt isgar, she muttered to herself that master had quite enough of these crable flummeries for the rest of his ber master had quite enough of these miserable flumeries for the rest of his natural life.

The lady's trunks had been bumped in after her, and presently they had to be pried open, for the lady's lips and eyes were closed, and she could not tell Hagar where the key lay to these fine treasures. But Hagar went to work with a will, and, before the preacher had addled his gray cob and started off on his five mile journey across the mountain for a doctor Hagar had put aside the ribbons and bits of traveling adornment for a long white muslin robe, which struck the preacher's heart with a chill somehow, and made him speed the pony on his way.

The doctor had some broken bones to set, and told Mr. Hume frankly that, so far as fevers and disorders of that kind went, that black woman of his was worth a dozen ordinary practitioners, and that he had long counted upon her in extremities of that sort; and, trotting over to Mr. Hume's the next morning, on his way from the setting of broken bones, the doctor called out to the parson to know if he was not right about the canability of Ha-

Hagar reckoned it was a considerable ma, but gave it as her opinion that me people's room was better'n their mpany; and adding that Mrs. Del-laine was talking too much, and that he had better go to sleep, Hagar went to f the room. No sooner had she gone than Mr. Hume smiled upon Mr. Hume. She gave her self up to the sweet relief and comfor of his presence. She began to believ self up to the sweet relief and comfort of his presence. She began to believe that destiny had determined this remark-able event in her life, and felt an irresistnoble and majestic, yet so gentle and ten der, as this preacher. She felt that she would much rather dwell with him "in would much rather dwell with him the midst of alarms than reign in this horrible place," but anything was better than to part with him.

"I am glad you have come," she said;
"I have something to say to you." A strange, wisful, discomitted look in his face diaquieted her, and she added, gently, "You will not despise a little advice, and remonstrance of mine?"

"foould despise nothing with which you were associated," he said.

"Then listen to me," she continued—"ait here by my side and listen to me. I am getting quite strong and well. You have saved my lile, you and your good Hagar, and the worst of it is that now I must go away." Here she pansed, and enjoyed the sudden wincing in his face, and resolved more and more to spare him the pang of parting. "I am going to coar you away from here," she said. "Indeed, indeed, Mr. Hume—May I call you Paul?

"Yes," he repifed, but began to grow pale.
"Indeed you are quite thrown away init for you? I promise you, if you will, our parting shall be brief. I have considerable influence, which I will wield in your behalf. You have but to be known to be appreciated. See the good you might do, Paul," she added, coaringly.

Her face took fire as she uttered his name, but that of the preacher grew paler and and old houses can be refurnished. Cold gray homespun can give place to Persian wools, edorous fires can still glow in old chimney-places. Since it is your will, air, to remain in this place, you will not object if I make the wilderness to blossom as the rose."

"Mrs. Delplaine!" he said, crunching the slim white hand that, rested on the arms of the chair close in the quivering muscles of his own.

Sing with and with pool care, in a week or one to house, and of succession of the control of the west in her languid convalencence,—wis constrained to sak of this councily but stern nerro woman something of her master. "Was he alone in the world? Had he no kindred?" Hager looked up from her knitting so stolidly that Mrs. Delplaine added, "Father or mother, wife or children?"

Hagar deliberately turned the heel of her stocking before she fully satisfied the curiosity of the convalencent. Then she youchsafed to say that he was quite alone; no father, nor mother, nor children, alone; no father, nor mother, nor children, alone in far as she knowed. There used to be embers into a blaze; resolutely she turned ome back.

"Did the poor lady die there?" said fars. Delplaine.

Hagar hesitated a minute. Then ahe and, "Xee, she died there, sure enough."

"And how many years has he lived in its decolate region, friendless and alone?"

glued to the windows of the coach, and two other wild, haggard orbs from the parson's study followed the lumbering vehicle till it became lost in its tortuous descent of the hill.

All this happened not many years ago, and it seemed as yesterday to the poor parson when, upon one morning, with a trembling hand he addressed a newspaper to a lady then traveling abroad. It contained the death of poor Mrs. Hume at Nassau, The sole answer he received was a shabby foreign abect, wherein among the marriages he found that of Mrs. Delplaine.

Some interesting figures have lately been published in Philadelphia showing that the consumption of beer is increaing enormously. From July 1, 1877, to to June 30, 1878, 651,324 casks of male liquors were brewed in that city. Dur ing the year ending June 30, 1877, which included nearly the whole of the Centennial season, when Philadelphia was invaded by hundreds of thousands of thirsty visitors, the manufacture aggregate 643, 847 casks, which was an extraordinary of the brewers, who thought that the demand would recede after the close of the Exhibition. If Philadelphia consumed all her own beer, last year's brew would farnish 408 glasses to every man, woman and child of her popluation.

Temperance lecturers might find in these figures a teeming text for ducourses on the growing taste for strong drink, were it not that they are accompanied by others fully as significant, which show that as the consumption of beer increases that of whisky and other distilled spirits falls off. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, Philadelphia paid $338,462 tax on spirits, and for the year ending June 30, 1878, only $152,373—a decrease of more than one half. Evidently the numerous recruits that have joined the army of beer-bibbers have come from the ranks of the whisky drinkers. The milder beverage has taken the place of the stronger one. If the figures for the whole country were obtained they would undoubtedly show that the experience of Philadelphia is the experience of Philadelphia is the experience of all other large cities. Gambrinus has dethroned delphia is the experience of all other large cities. Gambrinus has dethrone King Alcohol, and the stout keg and foam ling mug have taken the place of the fanup decanter and the "three-finger" glass
The change is undoubtedly in the direction of health and temperance. I men will drink, it is better that they should swallow the mild brew of the box and the malt than the fiery products of the still. Whisky excites the bad pasthe still. Whisey excites the bad pas-sions of human nature, making mer quarrelsome, violent brutes, but the nar-cotic preperties of beer produce on ma-natures a soothing effect, tending to friendliness and quietude. For Amerifriendliness and quietude. For Ameri-cans whisky is the worst possible drink, from its exciting quality, because they are disposed to too great activity of mind and body, being peculiarly excitable and energetic and often wearing themselves out before they approach old age. If any intoxicating beverage must be used, mild beer is undoubtedly best fitted for the National drink, is effect being to al-lay rather than increase the feverish rest-lessness of our National chaaracter.

A young man stepped into the office of the Indianapolis Rolling Mill not long since and asked for work. "What can you come from? From remayivana.

To Make Pionic Lemonade.

Here is a receipt for making pionic lemonade: First get your barrel. Then fill it with water. Don't be mean, put in plenty of water. Now throw a pound of white sugar into the barrel. Squeeze in a large suzed lemon. Don't be mean about the lemon, either, but put the whole of it in the barrel. Sit with a long pole and call the children up immediately. As fast as they drink, fill the barrel with cold water. The beverage thus made is cheap, (if the lemon is bought at whole-sale) and is quite healthy. It contains no pain, and is much sought after by incic lemonade differs from the church fair article by having the water a little fresher.—Oshkosh Christian Advocate. To Make Pienic Lemonade

Out of Tune.

When the tones of a musical instrument becomes harsh and discordant, we say it is "out of tune." The same may be said of that far more wonderful and complicated piece of mechanism, the human structure, when it becomes disordered. Not only actual disease, but those far more common causes, overwork, mental anxiety and fast living, may impair its vigor and activity. The best remedy for a partial collapse of the vital energies, from those as well as from other causes, is Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which is at the same time an agreeable and mind cheering cordial, and the best possible invigorant in all cases of
